

- Please correct the sentence in line 28. In Table 3, it can be seen that social distancing and protection negatively predicts competence satisfaction, not competence frustration.
- In line 32, it seems that you should write autonomy satisfaction. Because it is written in line 34 that autonomy frustration positively predicts interaction with the opposite sex.
- The finding of your study was that social distancing and protection negatively predicts competence satisfaction, which seems reasonable. However, why did you write in line 120 that you assume social distancing will strengthen satisfaction of needs?
- In the previous hypothesis in line 118, it does not seem very logical that skepticism will increase both satisfaction of needs and social anxiety. You wrote in the text that frustration of basic psychological needs is associated with increased social anxiety. Please check the written hypotheses again.
- In line 261, instead of the following manuscript, it is better to write study of Scheid et al. Also, in line 301, instead of the previous article, it is better to write the previous study.
- In line 278, doesn't the fact that IPP negatively predicted SEX mean that with increasing IPP, anxiety when interacting with the opposite sex decreases? If it means that, there is a little contradiction in your explanation.
- The material written in lines 282 to 290 seems to be more related to the relationship of IPP with autonomy frustration and competence frustration, and would be better combined with the above paragraph.
- In your findings, the fact that both autonomy satisfaction and frustration positively predict interaction with the opposite sex, mostly means that interaction with the opposite sex is not much affected by autonomy satisfaction and frustration. Please provide an explanation for this finding. Also, in line 307, you wrote that both autonomy satisfaction and frustration is related to more social interaction, which is not very logical, and please provide a reference if you have one.

- In line 353, it seems that it should be written that the sense of autonomy frustration is strengthened. In line 355, it seems that it should be written that hinders sense of competence satisfaction. Add in line 352, which prevents the satisfaction of relatedness.
- In line 370, it seems that it should be written autonomy satisfaction.
