CONCLUSION

We found that heterogeneity of decision making among individuals is important for overall benefit of a population. Our findings can be applied to any social conditions and could work for the contexts in clinics where conventional clinical trials cannot be designed because the contexts are too rare to design such trials or too personalized for patients.